Our Changing Population

New York's population is growing in age and diversity. These populations are increasing demands, with greater need for services, and consequent higher costs, on Upstate NY communities and municipal governments.

The Role of Public and Private Funders

How will these changing demographics affect funder priorities and community programs? How can we retain a high quality of life for both our aging residents as well as the young families who will be their neighbors and caretakers? How can we grow a vital New York economy? Project 2015 is a collaborative effort by New York State to involve all NY residents and all state agencies in addressing the issue. Learn about current efforts and strategize on directions for future plans.

Healthy children, families, and communities are important for the future economic success of the Upstate NY region. But how can we make healthy communities, in both urban and rural areas, if many families and particularly children continue to live in poverty, face discrimination, receive inadequate educations, or lack job skills. Only with strong financial resources, that is, adequate incomes and savings and equitable access to financial services, can families and communities better the lives of these children. Gwen Robinson of the Annie E. Casey Foundation will speak about the successes of AECF Family Economic Success programs and initiatives in American communities, and how funders can have lasting impact on children and families, transforming their communities.
